JAMES LOMBARDO ARRESTED.

Found in Boston-Wanted for Slashing Philip Pagan Two Years Ago.

James Lombardo, wanted for assault with intent to murder, was arrested in Boston Tuesday. The authorities there notified Capt. E. H. Richmond, who sent an officer to Boston on the 5.56 express Tuesday night to bring the prisoner back to this city, where he will be arraigned in police court on Thursday morning in all probability. Lombardo assaulted Philip Pagam, another Sicilian, who was walking along Valley street with his wife on Sunday evening. April 11, 1909, about 7, Gelock, Lombardo came up behind and siashed his victim on the right side of the face, narrowly missing the jugular vein. Lombardo made his escape and has evaded arrest ever since, although he has been very near to arrest on one or two occasions. The Hallan whom he assaulted lives in the stone house in the rear of McQuillian's salven on Mam street, and was at one time an officer in Italy. The assault was the result of some mix-up that occurred just two years ago to a day from the time of the crime and the arrest, at the notorious house at No. 13 Jacason place.

The night that Lombardo did the trick, the officers traced him to South Windham where he borrowed a hat at what is known as the Red house, but further search at the fime proved of no avail. Lombardo went to Wauregan and was employed in the mills there for several months and then went to Philadelphia, located in the Italian quarter, and became enamored of a young woman and was to marry her in September. Last week Captain Richmond learned that Lombardo was seen in Boston on the street in
